While the Republican leadership is deciding whether or not to support presumptive Republican presidential nominee Donald Trump, some singles are signaling that political controversy is a major turn-off when it comes to romance. In a new survey of 1,384 singles conducted by specialty dating service It's Just Lunch, when asked 'Has a date's political opinions ever ruined a date for you?' 33% said yes. Of that 33%, 15% gave their date another chance but 18% never wanted to see the other person again. Singles who labeled themselves as 'more conservative' were the most sensitive to the other person's political proclivities: 41% considered their meeting ruined and 21% wouldn't give their date a second chance.

As to that old adage to never discuss politics, especially on a date, 69% of singles found it to be at least potentially positive. 41% believed that talking politics on a first date was risky, but it could make for interesting conversation and 28% said it was a perfectly fine way for two people to see if they connect on an intellectual level.
